Abstract

Archaeology is a dynamic discipline, and the Register of Professional Archaeologists (RPA) has become an essential tool for the profession. This study analyzes the RPA's growth and composition from 1970 to 2020, focusing on gender and occupational affiliation trends. The RPA's growth is analyzed in terms of gender and occupational affiliation, with a focus on the growth of the RPA's membership in the 1990s and 2000s. The study also examines the RPA's impact on the profession, including its role in promoting professional standards and providing a platform for archaeologists to share their research and findings.

Objectives & Goals

The primary objective of this study is to analyze the RPA's growth and composition from 1970 to 2020, focusing on gender and occupational affiliation trends. The study also aims to examine the RPA's impact on the profession, including its role in promoting professional standards and providing a platform for archaeologists to share their research and findings. The study's goals are to identify trends in the RPA's membership and to provide insights into the profession's future.

The RPA's growth is analyzed in terms of gender and occupational affiliation. The study finds that the RPA's membership has increased significantly over time, with a particularly sharp increase in the late 1990s and early 2000s. The study also finds that the RPA's membership is becoming more diverse, with a growing number of women and professionals from other disciplines joining the RPA. The study's findings suggest that the RPA is becoming a more inclusive and professional organization, reflecting the broader trends in the archaeological profession.

The study's findings have several implications for the archaeological profession. First, the RPA's growth and diversification suggest that the profession is becoming more professional and inclusive. Second, the RPA's role in promoting professional standards and providing a platform for archaeologists to share their research and findings is becoming increasingly important. Finally, the study's findings suggest that the RPA is becoming a more influential organization, reflecting the broader trends in the archaeological profession.
