

Traven, B. – An Anti-Biography

Submitted by Red Mariott on May 22 2007 00:24

A short biography of the writer and anarchist, B. Traven, also known as Feige, Red Manut, Torvian, Croves...

B. TRAVEN – AN ANTI-BIOGRAPHY

*"An author should have no other biography than his books."
 "The biography of a creative man is completely unimportant."
 – B. Traven*

IF ONE HAS an interest in B. Traven, it should be - as he wished - as a result of what he wrote. Traven took great effort throughout his life to avoid any cult of personality or role of fame. Traven was only a name, one of many used in his life. The man behind the names was a complex character, famous for his novels as B. Traven - and, ironically, eventually famous for being someone trying to avoid fame. We will try to trace his history, sifting the facts from the speculation wherever possible. As Traven intended, what is fact and what remains speculation is still disputed by biographers.

Traven's novels began appearing in the German language in 1926. They were sent from Mexico to the 'Buchergilde Gutenberg', a German Left Book Club; the author's only contact address was a post box in a rural area. Speculation began soon after they were published; stylistic similarities in the writing style to a former anarchist comrade, Red Manut, were noted by some of Manut's old friends.

Manut was a touring bit-part actor and writer, based in Munich; he had participated in the Bavarian Council Republic established in 1919 during the German Revolution when workers councils appeared across the country. In the preceding years he had produced an individualist Stirnerite-influenced anarchist paper called 'Der Zeigelbrenner' - the 'Brickburner' (or 'Brickmaker'). He was obviously not a purist individualist, for he participated wholeheartedly in the Bavarian movement. When it was finally crushed by troops under the direction of the Social Democrats, Manut was apparently arrested, facing a death sentence for 'high treason'; he later related how he managed to escape in the nick of time. A wanted man, he travelled across Europe for the next three years, finally landing in London, where it's likely he was helped by Sylvia Pankhurst, the suffragette turned anti-parliamentarist communist. But he was arrested for failing to register as an alien and ended up in Brixton Prison where he was interrogated several times by the police.

It was probably the fear of being extradited back to Germany to face the treason charges that accounted, at least in part, for Traven's concealment of his identity for the rest of his life. Yet even earlier in his life he had apparently adopted a new identity as 'Red Manut', so perhaps it was also part of a more general personality trait.

During his questioning, Manut, understandably in view of the likely consequences of being repatriated, gave several false stories as to his origin and various false names. (Several decades later, this information was to give significant clues to a biographer of his real likely origins.) Manut was trying to convince the US Embassy to accept him as an American-born citizen, claiming his birth records had been destroyed in the San Francisco earthquake of 1906. Neither the US or British authorities were convinced - he was eventually released and caught a ship out of the London docks. He ended his journey in Mexico, where he settled for the rest of his life.

Traven took various kinds of employment in the new country, mainly manual work, and several trips to more remote parts of Mexico - particularly Chiapas. As he developed a greater understanding of Mexican culture he would later write a series of novels based on the recent revolutionary history of the country. But his first novels drew on his own recent history, or Red Manut's. (He was now often calling himself 'Torvian' or similar.) 'The Cotton Pickers' (also sometimes known as 'Der Wobbly') dealt with the Mexican adventures of an American 'Wobbly' or member of the Industrial Workers of the World - a US-based revolutionary industrial union that also had a wider presence, including in Mexico. This was based on Traven's working experiences when he first arrived in Mexico, in a variety of manual jobs.

'The Death Ship' was certainly based to some extent on his experiences on the way to Mexico and his time as a fugitive in Europe - it told the tale of a sailor who, in the aftermath of WWI, has lost his identity papers. No country will accept him or issue new identification - he is now officially a 'non-person'. In desperation he enlists on a 'death ship', the only vessel that will accept those with no papers. Death ships are destined to be sunk at sea so the owners can claim the insurance money. The crew knows this and can only try to be vigilant and prepared enough to maximise their chances of survival when the ship is finally scuppered.

Traven later wrote 'The Treasure of the Sierra Madre' and this was filmed by John Huston with Humphrey Bogart playing the main character. The story is of three men who combine to mine a rich source of gold and the greed and tragedy it introduces to their social relations. Traven was contacted by the film company via his Mexican mail box and asked to be a paid advisor during the film shoot. Traven declined but instead arranged to send his agent, Hal Croves, along to advise in his absence. It was suspected by some at the time, and much later confirmed by photographic and other evidence, that Croves was in fact Traven himself. The film was a major success and is now considered a classic, yet did not lead to further English language adaptations of his work. (But several Spanish language versions of his novels were later filmed in Mexico. 'The Death Ship' was also filmed in Germany.)
