

complexity during the Paleolithic in southwestern France. Their approach involves modelling how people would have incorporated knowledge into their decision-making processes given particular environmental parameters. Gibson discusses the limitations of expert-based systems and outlines the advantages of neural networks for analyzing archaeological data. He shows how neural networks have the capacity to use training data to formulate rules for classifying the extent of wear on teeth from archaeological sites.

Several papers in the statistics sections demonstrate the utility of correspondence analysis as a means of seriation. Axboe provides a lucid account of the technique with reference to Scandinavian bracteates. He notes the inductive nature of the analysis, and points out several potential problems. In other papers, correspondence analysis is used to study Bohemian pottery and hoards of Roman coins. The spatial distribution of Upper Paleolithic artifacts found in a rock shelter in Greece is investigated through unconstrained cluster analysis, and prehistoric German settlements are analyzed with nearest neighbor analysis and pair correlation functions. Several other papers discuss particular statistical methods such as diversity indices, discriminant analysis, and cluster analysis. In general, the papers are quite detailed and technical in nature.

The final section of the volume includes two papers on using visualization to reconstruct the damaged remains of Japanese archaeological sites. The analyses include estimating the original shape of buildings and tomb mounds from contour maps. In another paper, Reilly and Thompson use volume visualization and three-dimensional iconographic displays to map and compare subsurface features from core data. Banning discusses the creation of a HyperCard stack to present the results of an archaeological project in the Jordan Valley. The stack is organized around a spatial metaphor, allowing users to navigate multiple links and pathways through survey and excavation data by reference to maps and aerial photographs. In a similar vein, Maytom and Torevell discuss a Viking interactive laserdisc video where information is accessed and traversed through various threads. The volume ends with a discussion of simulation programs, with particular reference to a simulation of the Roman conquest of Britain developed for schoolchildren.

As is the case with most conference proceedings, the quality of the papers in the volume varies. Some are clearly written and present methodological advances devised in the context of innovative studies, whereas other papers lapse into detailed discussions heavily laden with jargon. That is not to say that the detailed papers do not have merit, for they will certainly appeal to a specialized audience. The volume's focus also varies, ranging from detailed statistical analyses, to image processing and GIS, to incipient virtual reality. The focus is on methods as opposed to theoretical or substantive contributions, and the volume would have been stronger if more attention had been paid to how computing the past will alter the way we interpret prehistory. The volume would also have benefited by including an introductory chapter to place the various contributions in context. The rapid pace of development in computer technology means that some papers, particularly in the database, and visualization, hypermedia, and education sections of the volume, appear ever so slightly dated. Despite this inescapable flaw, most papers provide fine examples of the range of possibilities available to technology minded archaeologists. Given the speed at which the volume was published, the production values are exceptional. The hardcover format of the book provides ample space for the many clear and understandable black and white figures and tables. For archaeologists interested in technology based methodologies, this volume will prove essential reading.
