Kirstie M. McClure

What has the discipline that calls itself "political science" to do with literary studies, anthropology, the philosophy of language, structural linguistics, or hermeneutics? With postcolonial theory, poststructuralism, semiotics, psychoanalysis, feminist theory, cultural studies, and other such pursuits? Anne Norton's 95 Theses raises these questions at the nexus of "Politics, Culture, and Method." Asked to consider this work both generally and with an eye to its potential impact on the discipline of political science, the subfield of political theory and disciplinary or subfield divisions, I find myself caught between the terms of the invitation and the implication of those terms for which the Theses offer no small spark. Curiously though, its most incendiary aspects appear not in Norton's own measured prose, but rather on its dust jacket. The back cover, for example, dubs it "an attack on the social science establishment," while an inner flap applauds Norton as a "political scientist" who has launched "a polemic against the orthodoxy of her own field." There, too, strident phrasing names the polemical target: "the antiquated and maddening models in the textbooks on method, in courses on methodology, championed by the self-appointed gatekeepers of a narrow and parochial political science." Norton, we've told, "opens the gates to more new practices, new principles, new questions, more methods, and more demanding ethical and scientific criteria."

Readers impressed or irked by this language, however, will be disappointed if they expect to find it mirrored in the book itself. Instead, they will find 95 brief theses,<sup>1</sup> reflective commentaries on each thesis in turn, and an Afterword on the work's genesis and aim. By way of a general overview, let me take a leaf from the text itself and begin by noting a few things about its structure and intended addressees. Then, rather than assuming readers' familiarity with the book, I'll suggest a strategy for reading the Theses and try to convey a measure of its substance. Following that, I'll return to the issue of polemical writing, the genre under which the dust jacket names the work, and along the way engage the question of the book's relation to the discipline, political theory, disciplinary and subfield divisions, and the like.

Structure and Audience

As Norton reminds us, "the form that a paper or a document takes tells how that text is to be read. The forms indicate the other texts it may refer to, the appropriate evaluative standards, assumptions, and often specific ambitions and political aims. Forms give texts different effects."<sup>2</sup> The sensible model for the 95 Theses is marked by the title itself: the theses that Luther affixed to the church in Wittenburg, Norton's theses, like Luther's, are best understood as grammatical rather than logical propositions and, like Luther's, too, the ordering principle of their commentary is a combination of thematic elaboration, topical association, and rhetorical recursion rather than a matter of logical argumentation from precise definitions to duly warranted conclusions.<sup>3</sup> Readers unaccustomed to the style may find this unpleasant. As Norton notes with regard to the stylistics of much interdisciplinary work, this sort of writing not only builds its "multiple systems of reference simultaneously," it also "presumes—and requires—a competence and attentive audience" as audience who "will recognize the presence of interconnecting structures and arguments in an analysis that will appear chaotic to those less learned or unfamiliar with this style."<sup>4</sup> For Luther, the competence and attention of his Christian audience were without saying, as both the pattern and the object of his disputation were matters of common reference and understanding. Indeed, it was precisely this common language that opened him to polemical rebuttal by Johann Tetzel, the Dominican whose entrepreneurial marketing of papal indulgences was the target of Luther's criticisms. Here, we might discern something of a disanalogy, for the extent to which Norton's theses share a language with the commonality of professional political scientists is not something that can be taken as given. I'll return to this later in some

Race recovers the history of this entrenched distinction and the divisive politics it engenders Victoria Hattam locates the origins of ethnicity in the New York Zionist movement of the early 1900s In a major revision of widely held assumptions she argues that Jewish activists identified as ethnics not as a means of assimilating and becoming white but rather as a way of defending immigrant difference as distinct from race rooted in culture rather than body and blood Eventually Hattam shows the Immigration and Naturalization Service and the Census Bureau institutionalized this distinction by classifying Latinos as an ethnic group and not a race But immigration and the resulting population shifts of the last half century have created a political opening for reimagining the relationship between immigration and race How to do so is the question at hand In the Shadow of Race concludes by examining the recent New York and Los Angeles elections and the 2006 immigrant rallies across the country to assess the possibilities of forging a more robust alliance between immigrants and African Americans Such an alliance is needed Hattam argues to more effectively redress the persistent inequalities in American life
