

Tourism and Economic Development: Evidence from Mexico's Coastline¹

By BENJAMIN FABER AND CECILE GAUBERT²

Tourism is a fast-growing services sector in developing countries. This paper combines a rich collection of Mexican microdata with a quantitative spatial equilibrium model and a new empirical strategy to study the long-term economic consequences of tourism both locally and in the aggregate. We find that tourism causes large and significant local economic gains relative to less touristic regions that are in part driven by significant positive spillovers on manufacturing. In the aggregate, however, these local spillovers are largely offset by reductions in agglomeration economies among less touristic regions, so that the national gains from trade in tourism are mainly driven by a classical market integration effect. (JEL L60, L83, O14, O18, R11, Z31, Z32)

A conventional view in the literature on economic growth and development is that the production of traded goods is subject to dynamic productivity improvements, whereas the services sector is perceived to be more stagnant.³ In line with this view, the locus of agglomeration economies is generally assumed to be the manufacturing sector, rather than services. This asymmetry has important implications for the growth strategies of developing countries, and whether they should prioritize the development of traded goods producing sectors. At the same time, there is relatively little empirical evidence on the economic consequences of the development of the services sector in developing countries, and whether the reallocation of factors of production into services can give rise to adverse long-term effects both locally and in the aggregate.⁴

This paper sets out to study the economic consequences of tourism, a fast-growing services sector in developing countries. Tourism involves the export of otherwise non-traded local services by temporarily moving consumers across space, rather than
