

Maslow's Hierarchy of Needs

Abraham Maslow (American psychologist, 1908-1970) carried out work around human motivation, innate human needs and self-actualisation. In 1943 he defined his theories as the Hierarchy of Human Needs. This consists of five categories of need and is often presented as a pyramid diagram.

The needs of most people will be satisfied in order of lowest level to highest. If a need is not satisfied, people will be motivated to satisfy it.

Physiological needs are the most basic of all, relating to things like food, water, clothing and shelter. (Example: a person who is hungry will eat.)

Safety needs relate to things like employment, health and shelter. (Example: a person who is unemployed will look for a job.)

Love and belonging needs relate to things like relationships with family, friends, colleagues and a sense of community. (Example: a person who is lonely will seek out friends.)

Esteem needs relate to things like respect, status and recognition. (Example: a person who is not respected will seek out ways to gain respect.)

Self-actualisation needs relate to things like personal growth, achievement and the pursuit of one's potential. (Example: a person who is not achieving will seek out ways to reach their potential.)
