

Community Development Research: Emerging concepts, methods and practices

Ma. Theresa V. Tungpalan, PhD
Aleli B. Bawagan, PhD

The application of social research in Community Development (CD) provides deeper meanings to action research, participatory research, and development research. Although these constructs emerged at different historical periods, their common thread weaves through three major themes – participatory methods, people’s action, and social transformation.

This paper aims to define development research in general and CD research in particular, as it has evolved over the years, using the theses and faculty researches as primary sources of data. The paper has the following sections: first is a summary of CD research done by the faculty and students at UP-CSWCD; second is a reflection on these researches identifying the nature of CD research; and the last section contains the good practices as well as the challenges faced by CD researchers.

These researches form part of CSWCD’s community-engaged scholarship, also called transformative scholarship, where the long-term perspective of academic pursuit is societal change and people’s empowerment. Moreover, the following characteristics are evident in these researches: the standpoint for the poor, marginalized, and disempowered communities; interdisciplinary and integrative approaches grounded on theorizing; and production of knowledge products that contribute to both individual and collective scholarship of CSWCD and the University to serve the people.

Introduction

Social research practice in recent years deals with various development concerns: from individual perceptions and behaviors to social issues and movements. Social research is neither monolithic nor static. It aims to create more spaces for discovery and learning. It is trans-disciplinary and dynamic. Social research concepts, methods, and practices continue to evolve in response to the changing needs of its different ‘publics’.
