

TWO BASIC TYPES OF CELLS

Cytologists recognize two basic types of cells; prokaryotic (pro = early/primitive, karyon= nucleus) and eukaryotic (eu = true, karyon = nucleus) cells. Prokaryotic cells consist of a single closed compartment that is surrounded by the plasma membrane, lacks a true nucleus; their genetic material lies in a free region known as a nucleoid. They have a relatively simple internal organization. All prokaryotes have cells of this type. Bacteria, the most numerous prokaryotes, are single-celled organisms.

Their differences have been tabulated below in on pg. 13. Organisms which do not possess a well formed nucleus and membrane-bound organelles are called prokaryote such as the bacteria. All others organisms possess a well defined nucleus, covered by a nuclear membrane and membrane-bound organelles. They are called eukaryotes.

PROKARYOTIC CELLS (Bacteria Are Simple Cells)

Prokaryotes, the bacteria, are the simplest organisms. Prokaryotic cells are small, consisting of cytoplasm surrounded by a plasma membrane and encased within a rigid cell wall, with no distinct interior compartments (figure below). A prokaryotic cell is like a one room cabin in which eating, sleeping, and watching TV all occur in the same room. Bacteria are very important in the economy of living organisms. They harvest light in photosynthesis, break down dead organisms and recycle their components, cause disease, and are involved in many important industrial processes.

- Strong cell wall

Most bacteria are encased by a strong cell wall composed of peptidoglycan, (also known as murein) which consists of a carbohydrate matrix (polymers of sugars) that is cross-linked by
