

"A series of impending movements"

DISSECTING THE DORYPHOROS

The Doryphoros, or Spun Discus, exhibits the proportional canon established by the Classical Greek sculptor Polykleitos in the 5th century BCE. The figure is depicted doing a diskos (disc) throw, a feat for which Roman copies, sculpted in marble, survive. The Doryphoros' composition gives an account of idealized anatomy, creating a series of "impending movements and values, and functions of life."

All the essential skeletal and soft-tissue marks are properly positioned on the Doryphoros, creating the artist's ideal prototypicality of skeletal structure and muscular-skeletal connections. Following these landmarks, it is possible to reconstruct the details of the spine from a stone COPIA. Although idealized as a "type" and somewhat general of their respective aspects, the figure's muscular form is correctly synthesized and properly positioned on the skeleton. One can speculate that the mechanization of proper form and structural forms helped maintain correct aesthetic canon and a high level of quality in the production of the last other Classical artworks.

1378: Reconstructed version of the figure, showing the skeleton.
