

- The second disagreement deals with the method in which society is to apply its control of property and other assets.
- In this instance, the major camps comprise generally defined factions of centralists and decentralists.
- On the centralist side are socialists who want to subsidize public control of property in some central government, such as the state—or the state under the supervision of a political party; this was an extreme form of socialism practiced in the Soviet Union.
- Those in the decentralist camp believe that decisions concerning the use of public assets and properties should be made at the local, or lowest-possible, level by the people who will be most immediately affected by those decisions.
- This dispute has continued during the course of the history of socialism as a political faction.
